In a nutshell, things are so good and calm and safe in the City of Jewel that everyone is afraid of everything. Adults are controlled through a cult of fear of injury to their children. The Guardians of the children exercise tremendous power, and the most repressive measures are always justified by reference to what is best and safest for the children.

So, with Museum about to come into the shops, I 've just finished the second book in the trilogy, City of Lies, and started on the third book, Path of Beasts. There 's still stuff to do to City, of course, including the copy-edit. And I have to do descriptions of the different characters so that Sebastian can work his magic again.
